If you have had the privilege to spend some time in the ICU of a hospital, you will probably remember certain defining moments, such as the moment when you first found yourself here, and the moments when you realised that, indeed, you were in the ICU and would stay there for a period of time (usually a few weeks or months). Perhaps you were confused as to why you were here, or what you were being treated for? Your first thought was: why the heck did I end up here, in this place? There was a lot of pain, you felt like you were on some kind of foreign terrain and most of the things you did, or did not do, or even said, left you feeling exhausted, drained and a bit down and depressed, which was not exactly the attitude that a person should have in this kind of place. If you were lucky enough to be in the ICU during the day, you would find the nurses (and patient-care assistants) to be very busy, rushing here and there, rushing to attend to whatever one of the patients needed, and rushing off to attend to the next need. However, it was very quiet at night and you would find many of the
