Abnormal wall motion was observed at rest in 10 of 25 patients with coronary disease and no regional wall motion abnormalities (angiographically and echocardiographically normal) during exercise. Four patients had occlusive coronary artery disease (lesions with angiographically normal coronary flow) and six had coronary spasm. In all, wall motion abnormalities were detected in regions with substantial stenosis. With the use of intracoronary thrombolysis (with streptokinase, anagrelide or tissue plasminogen activator) these abnormalities improved or resolved, whereas with intravenous streptokinase and/or adenosine they disappeared. These data support the hypothesis that abnormalities of coronary blood flow are a cause of wall motion abnormalities in patients with coronary disease. Although the cause of these abnormalities is uncertain, a simple explanation is that ischemia is often associated with a subendocardial redistribution of blood flow that alters the pattern of myocardial contraction and is detected by ultrasound as an abnormal wall motion. Socioeconomic status differences in parental involvement in childhood growth and
