Jun 24, 2020 A transgender teenager in Texas, who was under the care of the gender specialist, was hospitalized and then sent home with a 17-hour head cold. As a result, her medical condition worsened and she died. 14-year-old Kelsey Cruz was admitted to an urgent care clinic in August 2016, with her mother. Kelsey was labeled as a mama-boy, a term used to describe male-to-female transgender individuals whose assigned sex at birth is male. According to Kelsey's mother, Tammy, she stopped eating and drinking, and became bloated. Tammy was told that Kelsey had an "obstruction" in her stomach that could possibly be related to a peptic ulcer or a tumour, according to the Houston Press. Texas teen dies after being sent home with a 17-hour-head cold. However, the hospital staff allowed Kelsey to come home after 17 hours. That was when things started to get worse. When her step-father noticed she had a fever, she was sent home again, where, for the next several days, she got progressively worse with every passing hour. Her mother even wrote about the appalling state of her daughter's health. "By the time the nurse called her pediatrician at about 3:30 in the morning for a bottle, she was able to sip a little water, but that was it," Tammy wrote in a Facebook post. "Unfortunately, she was sent home again because the nurse said it was a 17-hour-head cold. We brought her in at 7:00 in the morning for her bottle and she sat there and told the nurse she could only drink from a straw." "I called the nurse at 2:30 that afternoon to see how she was, and she said they had sent her home again. This time, it was even worse, and she had an earache. "We called them at 3:30 the next morning and I begged them to take her back, because I was afraid she had a pinched nerve in
