A model is developed to simulate the self-generated current in the piezoelectric devices and the influence of temperature, load resistance and load capacitance on the current. With the introduction of the time-dependent conduction in the piezoelectric device, the current intensity is represented by the first order derivative of the electrical voltage and the second order derivative of the electrical displacement. To simplify the model, the internal forces of the piezoelectric material are considered to be proportional to the output charge densities. The output charge densities and the current intensity are determined from the electric field and the electrical displacement in the piezoelectric device. The developed model is verified by comparing the simulated and experimental results.
