Natural selection is usually applied to populations of constant size, in which selection is non-random and chances of genetic death are equal. However, at the population level, we do not observe selection directly because fitness is averaged with respect to demographic and evolutionary processes. The null expectation for natural selection is thus a non-random process to which fitness is sensitive, and selection is expected to act on slightly deleterious mutations. In this paper, we formulate a null expectation for the distribution of fitness effects in heterogeneous populations, where populations exhibit demographic fluctuations at varying rates, selection does not act, and mutation occurs as in a homogeneous population. We assume that fitness remains constant within a population, and that selection occurs at the individual level
