When a sweltering heat wave depleted water tanks at an agricultural water storage tank company in Santa Fe, N.M., officials scoured the landscape for a new site to avoid the same fate. They were assisted by two men who had briefly worked for the company: Jacobo Hermosillo and the co-owner of the New Mexican Natural Farming Inc., where he now lives. After the company completed the new tank and showed it to potential water users, they found a creative way to deal with thieves: During the summer months, thieves pulled the top off the tanks when workers weren't watching. To prevent a repeat of those events, Hermosillo and the co-owner of New Mexican Natural Farming Inc. created an upside-down tank so that the heat-tolerant algae could grow just underneath the muddy top of the tank. The algae convert excess water into oxygen, providing a natural protection against an intrusion. There are now half a dozen tanks up and running in New Mexico, says Tony Stewart, owner of New Mexican Natural Farming Inc. “I’m not sure how they have gotten away with it for this long, but we have had no problems since we installed the tanks, ◆

Glutamate transport during human in vitro fertilization. Glutamate uptake by the human placenta is known to be related to the maturation of this organ. We have investigated the importance of glutamate transport in human fertilized oocytes and early embryogenesis. Glutamate transport was examined in isolated human pre-implantation embryos and in cells from the cumulus oophorus complex of hysterectomy specimens, i.e. cumulus cells. Glutamate transport at the placental level was assessed by using the accumulation of alpha-[1-¹⁴C]-2-deoxyglucose into the embryonic cells.

Glutamate (1 to 10 mmol/l) stimulated glucose transport by 60 to 130 per cent in early human embryos, cumulus cells and trophoblast cells, whereas in the latter two cell types, the transport was found to be carried out by means of Na(+)-dependent transport processes. The glutamate transport was much lower than that of glucose transport in pre-implantation embryos and cumulus cells. The number of Na(+)-dependent glutamate transport processes increased during maturation of cumulus cells. This increase was associated with the presence of increased amounts of mRNAs for Na(+)-dependent glutamate transport.
