This interview focuses on EA SPORTS FIFA Mobile's exclusive, HyperMotion Technology and player movements that create the greatest sense of control in the game. FIFA Mobile's presentation of dynamic player controls, based on actual movement data collected from real players, is detailed in the interview. How does FIFA Mobile handle player passing/moving/shooting with the ball after passing or movement? Passing, moving and shooting are very complex movements, and are handled individually. After the player passes, the ball can be in a straight line to the receiving player (usually the target player) or on a curved path. For a curved path, the level of curvature can be increased or decreased based on the pass, distance and speed of the pass. When the player wants to move the ball and receive a pass at the same time, they must make a new pass. For example, if the player moves back to pass, the pass is made to the player who is closest to them. The direction of the new pass depends on the direction of the player movement. The type of pass also depends on the distance and speed between the player and their destination. A short pass is made when the distance to the player is less than 1.5 meters. A long pass is made when the distance to the player is greater than 1.5 meters. There is also an option for the player to keep the ball and shoot at the target player (if the ball is on their own goal line), or for the player to keep the ball and pass it (if the ball is in the final third of the field). During a buildup, the player moves towards the target player, and runs towards the ball. If the player moves forward or backwards and receives the ball at the same time, they make a move pass. If the player moves and receives the ball at the same time, they make a move shot. Shooting also depends on speed and timing, and the player must choose what line to shoot on. Shots can be made by moving backwards, forwards or sideways towards the player.
