It's easy to understand why: The measures, to clamp down on speculation and implement price controls, are promoted as ways to improve food-safety, improve nutrition and combat soaring costs. But the fact that farmers won't be affected is an important omission. The blogosphere is full of anti-pork, mostly because of pork's environmental impacts and the fact that a goodly portion of pork is fed to animals that live longer lives in cramped confinement, for which they receive no portion of the profits. People should be wary of the notion that feeding animals to enormous numbers of, say, chickens will somehow save the environment. It is correct that inbreeding may contribute to genetic defects in swine, but it is also true that, conversely, inbreeding may mitigate the influence of such defects. In California, swine are kept in small groups, which makes the notion of damaging inbreeding less of an issue. If consumers are going to be worried about the pig-bacteria, why not worry about the
