Meet the motion capture suits: Ball - Includes the "Hologram" suit: This suit recreates a player's body shape as a holographic display. It helps players manage the ball and reproduce high-energy balls. This suit uses data acquired from ball touches, as well as accelerometer and magnetometer data. On the Ball - This includes two types of suits, in addition to the Hologram: a flexible, thin, and lightweight suit; and a more conventional motion capture suit. The flexible suit is used for tracking fast-paced actions in tight spaces, such as headers, balls played from back-passes or crosses. The conventional motion capture suit is used for tracking post-contact actions, such as dribbling, free kicks and throw-ins. Sprint - This includes two motion capture suits: a lightweight suit and a more conventional motion capture suit. The lightweight suit captures sprint and sprint transitions. The conventional motion capture suit allows players to more easily manage sprint transitions. Tracking - This suit includes two types of motion capture suit: a flexible, lightweight suit; and a more conventional motion capture suit. The flexible motion capture suit is used for tracking faster pace actions, such as sprints and sprint transitions. The more conventional motion capture suit is used for slower pace, distance-based action, such as taking a corner. Passing - This includes two types of motion capture suits: a flexible, lightweight suit; and a more conventional motion capture suit. The flexible motion capture suit is used to track passes, while the more conventional motion capture suit allows players to more easily manage passes, because of its high degree of freedom. Head - This includes three types of motion capture suits: a flexible, lightweight suit; a more conventional motion capture suit; and a super-lightweight, small size, yet highly accurate and reliable "Hologram" suit. The flexible motion capture suit is used for detecting heading actions, such as heading the ball or taking an aerial shot. The more conventional motion capture suit is used to track heading away from opponents. The super-lightweight, small size, yet highly accurate and reliable Hologram suit is used to track heading against opponents. Dribbling - This includes three types of motion capture suits: a flexible, lightweight suit; a more conventional motion capture suit; and a super-lightweight, small size, yet highly accurate and reliable
